Vanka's lips twitched, he rubbed his eyes with a black fist and gave a sob.

'I will grind your snuff for you,' he went on. I will pray for you and you can flog me as hard as you like if I am naughty. And if you think there is nothing for me to do I will ask the steward to take pity on me and let me clean the boots or I will go as a shepherd-boy instead of Fedya. Dear Grandad I can't stand it. It is killing me. I thought I would run away on foot to the village but I have no boots and I am afraid of the frost. And when I grow up to be a man I will look after you and I will not let anyone hurt you and when you die, I will pray for your soul like I do for my Mummie.'

And it was at that age ... Poetry arrived

it came from, from winter or a river.
I don't know how or when,
no they were not voices, they were not
words, nor silence,
but from a street I was summoned,
from the branches of night,
abruptly from the others,
among violent fires
or returning alone,
there I was without a face
and it touched me.

A young man, weary from his search for peace, decided to seek the guidance of a wise old master who lived alone on a remote mountain. After days of difficult travel, he finally reached the place. The master greeted him warmly.

"What troubles you, dear young man ?" asked the master.

The young man sighed. "I've been meditating for years, and seeking answers. But I still feel restless. I want to find peace, but it seems out of reach."

The master smiled gently and said, " Come with me."

The two walked down to a nearby lake. The master picked up a smooth stone and tossed it into the water. "What happens when the stone hits the lake ?" asked the master.

The young man watched ripples* spread across the water. "The water is disturbed, and ripples form, moving outward", he replied.

The master nodded, and then waited in silence. Slowly, the ripples faded, and the lake returned to its previous state of stillness.

"And now ?" asked the master.

"The water is calm again," said the young man.

The master said. "This lake is like your mind. When thoughts, emotions, or outside events disturb you, they create ripples, just like the stone. The more you focus on them, the longer they last. But if you let them settle, the mind naturally returns to peace."

The young man stood in thought. "So, my mind is already peaceful. I've been creating ripples by thinking too much."

The master nodded. Happily, the young man returned, ready to live with a calmer heart.
